Don't Go One-By-One With...

If you win the battle you're probably going to lose the war. The more right you are, the more damage it will do in the long run.
We had a heated exchange with his boss. One day he got into a situation several years ago where he was asked to resign. This was a very unfortunate situation, not because he was a very unfortunate situation, but because I told the employee that I would be happy to see him go. I told the employee that I would be happy to see him go because he felt that once I knew all the details of the management structure of the company, I would be able to tell him how his boss might have been better off if he had a job. The situation did not reflect well on the company, but his boss still had a job.

Getting Ahead

'WEVE JUST BOUGHT THIS COMPANY AND WED LIKE YOU TO RUN IT ...?'

You can't stop your company from making stupid acquisitions or getting involved in businesses they shouldn't be in. But you can try to avoid becoming part of a team that's going to 'continue its success' or turn it around. For, more often than not, you will find yourself in a no-win situation. A company is usually bought for one of two reasons: either because it is successful - which means the seller can do is make it slightly better - or because it is unsuccessful and the buyer feels he can turn it around. There are always hidden reasons why a company is unsuccessful as well as the obvious ones, as problems and what can be done about them, but this kind of fore-knowledge is rare. Usually, you don't know until you discover the real problems and whether they are solvable. Moreover, if you have taken on a management position in a business you know nothing about, you start with a strike against you. Your efforts are going to be resented by employees who do know the business even if they aren't very capable of doing it.

IT MAY SEEM LIKE A LATERAL MOVE BUT ...?

Vertical shifts of this exist up and down the corporate structure. The lateral shift, particularly if you suspect the skills involved are not our strong suit, presents a two-pronged problem. Either the new division is already well run, which means you will never get any credit, or it's poorly run, in which case your effectiveness is probably going to be limited by those above you.

'WEVE CREATED THIS NEW POSITION ESPECIALLY FOR YOU ...'

The job doesn't make much sense to you, and you aren't really sure it will work in practice the way it sounds in theory, but the pay is better and it's more responsibility ... Watch out.
